It may be said that artists and the art historians forge the master keys that open the mysterious locks to our senses, to which originally only Nature held the key. They are complex locks. Enrique Martínez Celaya is an artist who thrives on such complexities as he explores the media of painting, photography, and sculpture from the perspective of a scientist, philosopher, poet, and intellectual. One may also be tempted to describe his search for the answers to life’s meaning as that of an existentialist, an analytic philosopher seeking "truth" in human existence through artistic expression and creation. The work of Martínez Celaya is informed by his intellectualism and by his sensitive responses to the world around him, especially to nature and family.

Martínez Celaya uses the process of creating art to understand these life experiences and their effects on his everyday reality. Often, as he begins to layer paint, tar, photographs, drawings, words, and other materials on the surfaces of his canvases, he is not sure what will evolve, or how. He can work on a painting for months, reworking, adding, scraping, and layering—sometimes destroying and beginning again. Some of his most powerful works involve the application of tar and feathers, materials that imply history and violence. Tar is like blood; both are natural.

The Rhythms of Life

viscous substances, yet Martínez Celaya gives them new meanings as life substances with dark overtones. He also uses blood as a medium with its own unique characteristics. His faith in the medium and the process results in what he describes as "projects" or "cycles" rather than "series".

The publication of his most recent book, Martínez Celaya: Early Work, presents an opportunity to focus on some of his latest works (2004–06) within the context of his career (1977–present). The book is divided according to his projects, which have been compiled from his studio archives of photographs, sketches, and reproductions of the works, and they reveal that, for the artist, "The urgency of certain interests and methods always had their moment. The projects follow the rhythms of life, often mapping my inadequacies more than my strengths." In the book, the images are organized in reverse chronology, and this decision encapsulates the work ethic of Martínez Celaya, who explains that: "In conventional chronologies a linear progression is assumed: early activities seem inevitably and almost deterministically to lead to subsequent or later activities that tend to fix the meaning and significance of the past... The organization suggests something else. The past is not causally linked to the present, but is alive, active, and a source of continued reflection and interpretation."

This is an important statement that suggests an evaluation or discussion of his work from a conceptual rather than linear perspective. Certain subjects appear again and again: the boy, children, the sea, trees, mountains, animals, and birds. However, in each project, they take on new meanings with a wide range of emotions and aesthetic expressions.

The boy who appears so often in Martínez Celaya's work may be seen as the artist's alter ego, a vision of self-exploration. He is a monumental presence as a life-size sculpture made of paint, dirt, straw, steel, glass, and flowers (Boy in Vitrine, 2004); he is a subtle reflection of the child coming of age (Boy Raising His Arms, 2005); and he floats above the ice-blue sea, as rapturous as he is brooding in other works (Boy and Iceberg, 2005). The boy appears often: solitary, in shadow, in photographic reality, in paintings, drawings, and installations. Is he the frightening tarcovered vision in bronze on a marble table in The Leopard (2005), who lies there with a gavial in the process of being devoured by a leopard?

Such dark imagery once earned Martínez Celaya the nickname "Prince of Darkness." His October Cycle (2000–02) with its origins in philosophy, poetry, and complex life experiences, was meant to "function as icons, an aesthetic form that invites contemplation of the transcendent through the immanent." Martínez Celaya describes it as: "an extended metaphor exploring the relationship between the seasons and the transition in human life. The large paintings are covered with emulsified tar combined with oil paint and solvents to generate a compelling surface with colors ranging from blacks and browns to warm, rich tones of amber and rose. The imagery of trees, figures, and falling snow emerges as notations of experience—and traces.

What at first may appear as dim and mysterious, as in Man and Sky (2002) and Tree in Snow (2002), upon close examination reveal traces of white and rainbows beneath the surface that speak more of hope than of darkness and evoke a mood of scientific inquiry transformed into an alchemical ritual. Has the scientist/artist now become the artist/scientist? Martínez Celaya is and has always been both; now, he has substituted instruments of precision for the rituals of a shaman. Art is an act of transformation, like science, poetry, photography, and music—each is significant to Martínez Celaya's aesthetic.

Music is the subject of one of his most provocative projects: Schneebett (2003–04) was inspired by the death of Beethoven and reveals the artist's fascination with the genius composer. The project involved an intense period of research and work that concluded with exhibitions in Paris, in Aspen, at the Berliner Philharmonie in 2004, and at the Museum der bildenden Künste Leipzig in 2006, where the work was installed in a bed of snow. The installation of Beethoven's deathbed at the Philharmonie was based on drawings of the actual bed. It was a refrigerated bronze bed, with its pillow and sheets made of frost; it was placed against a large painting of a snowfilled birch forest, and the horizon line was meant to symbolize the view from the composer's room and the transition from life to death. Dead birch branches from the nearby Berlin Tiergarten completed the effect of a cold, contemplative environment. The cold climate of Nordic places, which has appeared in Martínez Celaya's images of romantic mountain landscapes and floating icebergs, was brought inside: death is winter.

In Florida, there is no winter, and the past few years have forced a change of mood in Martínez Celaya: a lighter palette interrupts the brooding tar paintings that continue to be part of his oeuvre. Two projects, The Atlantic (2004–05) and Shore: “Is Today Yesterday?” (2004–05),10 are the first to be presented in his new book, according to his reverse chronology, and may be seen not only as a new direction for the future but also as a summation of the past. Shore was inspired by a question asked by Martínez Celaya's three-year-old daughter and by the transitory experience embodied in a camphor tree that he saw one day as he biked along the shore road. A visual commentary on the illusion of permanence, the project is "an environment of works in which children and the landscape articulate concerns of identity, displacement, and mortality." His children play a significant role in his life and his work. However, they are never simply the objects of artistic invention or fatherly pride but important participants in his creative process. In Shore, the minimal work has a quiet intensity that marks Martínez Celaya's aesthetic of absence. Figures emerge from beyond a ghostly presence to become phantoms integrated in new environments, with the sand and sea. Boy in Sunset (2005) is a large diptych with a mirror. A boy, with arms outstretched, stands against a dark background created from oil and tar; the glow of a sunset forms a halo. He is about to fly and appears like a mythical figure surveying his territory. A mirror disrupts the space, forcing the image into an ordinary space, a studio or gallery, and breaks the reverie.

In The Atlantic (2005), Martínez Celaya reveals his relationship with the tropical landscape of Florida, its blue sky and seas and exotic trees that thrive in the warm moist air. He describes the smell of the place as "a complex Southern mixture of death and melancholia that some around here call excitement." The haunting presence of a small boy appears often in this project. In Boy Against the Horizon (2005), a life-size figure made with ink on canvas, the photographic quality of the figure is a counterpoint to the painterly background of the sea. This figure appears again in The Water (2005), an elegant abstraction of sea and human form. The juxtapositions of time and space and disparate media lead to a different perception of Martínez Celaya's ideas, which he uses to create a total concept.

A huge diptych, No Title (2006), commissioned for the exhibition "The Missing Peace: Artists Consider the Dalai Lama," dominated Martínez Celaya's studio in recent months. Beside the large painting, a mirror of equal size reflects the viewer and his/her space as much as it serves as a dislocating element that visually invades the wall and the space itself. The image of a storm dissolves, with lightning as a metaphor for conscience. It is streaked with a substance that turns out to be blood, which expresses the temporal, yet there is a strangely sublime and calming effect as Nature shows her power. It is not a violent image but rather an oasis of calm and peace amidst the drama of nature.

While he was preparing for exhibitions and residencies in Europe, Japan, and the United States, Martínez Celaya embarked on another project based on the work of the Russian poet Osip Mandelshtam for the Sara Meltzer Gallery in New York City (May–June 2007). The exhibition's title, "Awaiting a Second Plan," simultaneously confessed failure and hope. This hope was of interest to Martínez Celaya as he explored the philosophical and the poetic through memorializing Mandelshtam's wife as the metaphor for solitude in The Two Worlds (2006, Figure 11).

Inspired by the cycles of nature, the works of Enrique Martínez Celaya follow the rhythms of life as sensual references to the illusions of the real and the imaginary. They proclaim the right of art to soar and to invade the territory of the intellect and the scientific with a material literalness that ranges from the luminous and ephemeral to the depths of the obscure.11 I am grateful to Enrique Martínez Celaya for the opportunity to interview him at his studio and to preview his new book and work in progress.
